On Dracula and Dorian Gray: The Literary Magnetism of Internal Conf ict

A.J. Dilts

Literature is a form of magnetism. On opposite poles rest the contrasting elements of a story: atmosphere and individual, action and exposition, good and evil. The characters in a novel lay between these poles, perpetually being pulled in either direction until a dominant tendency emerges. In

Power and Identity in Frank X Walker's When Winter Come

Maeve Dunn

	Although the connection may not be obvious to some, power and identity go hand-in-hand. Throughout history, identity in terms of gender,

	In many Native American tribes, people are dependent on nature to guide them through life both geographically and spiritually; in a sense, nature possesses a sort of power over their lives. In the poem "The River
